Winefuse (VirusTotal: 7/7) macOS Mojave 10.14 Windows 10 Linux In February 2015, the U.S. government revealed that Apple and Google had both to date refused access to the Department of Defense's $1.3 million-a-year Department of Homeland Security contracts. It was the first public admission that the companies met the legal definition of a "cyber-sovereign," or a company that can monitor all of its users' internet activities without their consent. Both Apple and Google had denied not having any interest in acquiring that level of power over their customers' data. However, Apple CEO Tim Cook had previously said on the company's website, "We will neither hide from this issue nor run from it," adding, "The security and privacy of our users is our highest priority." In the past, Google had also told privacy advocates that it would "absolutely" refuse access to its data. Both companies have maintained that their products and services are safe and that they would protect their users' privacy. And in 2013, Apple told the Financial Times that it did not have plans to restrict the government's access to its user data. Google has had a long-standing policy to not disclose whether it cooperated with law enforcement in a user's case, saying that it respected the "orderly administration of justice". As of 2018, the company says that it does not comply with any law that "requires us to compromise our users' privacy or to impede their use of our products." Apple does not disclose any personal information about its users to law enforcement, while its iPhone models are locked down by pass codes and require a device's owner to have their password reset using a pass code every few weeks. In 2013, citing the Apple's own privacy policy, security consultant Daniel Miller said "even if Apple is legally required to comply with a government search warrant, there's no reason to think Apple would simply hand over data that it is legally forbidden from handing over" Microsoft, which is much more reliant on government contracts than Apple, has similar policies. According to Reuters, Microsoft's chief privacy officer, Greg Honwana, said that the company does not hand over any personally identifying information to law enforcement or security services without a warrant. In 2007, the U.S. Department of Justice asked Apple and several other tech companies to create systems that would allow the government access to data on seized iPhones
